dence to the Ledger STEAMER SIDNEY, Upper Mississippi, June 10.—Can you imagine a fleurishing town of twenty thousand inhabitants gradually losing in population and influence until hardly a suggestion of its former glory remains? Such a town is Nauvoo, perched high on the Illinors bank of the Upper Mississippi. The story of this city's magic growth and its subsequent downfall is history with which every one is in a measure acquainted. About fifty years ago this early home of Mormonism flourished. Broad streets were extended in all directions, splendid houses were projected and a temple that was the glory of all this section was in course of erection. Joseph Smith, with his mysterious plates and slabs of marble, had clung to his people and their cause after having been ousted by the Gentiles of Missouri. and under his leadership the foundation of what was thought to be a permanent colony was laid on the bluffy Mississippi banks. Ere the grand marble temple, which, Mark Twain says, "achieved some celebrity in a section where a brick court house with a tin dome and cupola on it was contemplated with reverential awe," was completed, the leader Smith was slain. With this invasion commenced the downfali of the prosperous city. Smith's successor was a false prophet and the great Brigham Young soon overthrew him. Dissension caused trouble in the church, but under Brigham's strong hand everything was soon righted. The great leader foresaw that the colony could looking after the east half mile. never flourish among the Gentiles,
